The Globe Mills Fire. The following incidents of the late fire at the Globe Mills in Philadelphia are narrated by correspondent of the New York Herald : The instant the alarm was given Ellen Hever, who was on the first floor, with a noble instinct that cost her her life, ran up stairs to the third and fourth floors and urged her companions to fly for their safety. This brave woman might have saved herself, being on the street floor; but she determined to make a desperate effort to rescue those who were in greater peril. Following her, the five on the fourth floor and the one in the third story ran down the stairway.

But they were already too late. Reaching the second floor they were confronted by the flames which were making their course toward the roof. The women turned to flee from the dreaded element, but there was no escape from it on the second floor and they saw they must either go above or make their escape from the windows. Just back of the mill stood an old shed which could be reached from the second floor without danger of life or limb, and, with a presence of mind which is seldom witnessed at such a time, four of the women made a rush through the flames to the windowsill and dropped over upon this frame structure. These tour were Cornelia Peterson, Maggie Sheridan, Maggie Sweeney and Mattie Hoover.

Cornelia Peterson was missing for some time and it was thought she had perished in the building, but about an hour after information was received that she had reached her home in safety. They were all singed, however, but none of the five received any serious wounds.

But the most terrible portion of this disaster is yet to be told. The brave woman who had risked her own life to save the others was not among those who reached the window. Before she and Ann Patterson and Maria Hoover could follow their companions even that avenue of escape was cut off. Great tongues of flame suddenly burst up through the floor in front of this window, to pass through which would have been certain and terrible death. The great crowd which had collected on the street could see the three wo men rushing from one corner of the room to the other, making frantic gestures for assistance, but help was paralyzed by the intense heat which went out from the burning building. With a cry of despair the trio saw the lurid flame increasing and they were driven back up the stairway, continuing on until they reached the fourth floor. Here they felt safe for a W. F. Easterling. brief time, and brief it was, for a few minutes had only elapsed before the flames came creeping through the floor. There was no time for thought, and only a desperate resort could save them now.

The agonized crowd that was powerless to aid shouted, "Jump!" "Don't be burned to death; you had better be maimed than that." "Jump, and we will save you." Some men rolled bales of rags and shoddy under the windows and called again to the women who could be seen through the smoke wildly gesticulating and imploring help as only despair can, for the cruel flames were even then singeing them. The excitement in the crowd was almost madness. Some lost their wits entirely, and as the men piled up the rags for the women to fall upon others dragged them away, not knowing what they did.

Aun Patterson was the first to attempt to escape by this terrible alternative. Climbing upon the window sill she made the frightful leap into the street four stories below. Strong men sickened and turned away their heads. There was a moment of awful suspense. The second of time occupied in falling seemed like an hour to those who witnessed the sight, and when she struck the pavement a cry of agony arose from the multitude heart rending to hear, and which those who were present will never

The other two women had secured a rope, which they fastened to the sill, but it only reached down to the top of the second story windows. It was the best they could secure, however, and one came down after the other, Ellen Hever first and Ann Patterson next. The fall from the end of the rope was very severe, and when the three women were picked up they were bruised and mangled beyond re-

MR. DANA'S SPEECH .- Charles A. Dana. editor of the New York Suo, was made chair man of the Tammany ratification meeting on Tuesday night, and in his speech said : "The republican party has been in power for fifteen years, and see where it has brought us and where it has brought itself. One member of the cabinet is now under impeachment for bribe taking; another, more guilty, but more cuoning than he, deserves impeachment, and I trust will get his deserts, [applause;] another, lately Secretary of the Interior, having committed grand larceny in his office, resigned to avoid impeachment, and another, lately Attorney General, having com mitted petit larceny, was finally removed from his place through a contemptible social intrigue. Such are the representatives of the republican party in the heights of power; and going down from that elevation we find everywhere corruption, venality, contempt of law, and plunder of the taxpayers. One would suppose that the deent men of such a party, seeing its condition, would be overcome by a sense of shame, and would require it to step down and out, to hide its face and to die from among men; but, inbe bought anywhere.

GEO. McBURNEY & SON, stead of this, it comes forward with candidates and a platform to ask for the votes of the people, and to make a fight in the election. The impudence, the effrontery of this proceeding exceeds everything ever heard of before; and yet we have here the same managers who have brought the rapublican party into this condi tion, with Zich Chandlier at their head, talking about reforming the civil service and restoring the earlier purity of our politics? Do they expect anybody to believe them? Is there any considerable number of fools in the country who can again be deceived by such fraud? These are questions which the election will answer, and answer as I hope and trust by putting Sam Til den in power and establishing the St. Louis platform as the character of a real radical, and lasting reform."

An extraordinary case of prolongation of life under water occurred in one of the Scine swimming baths recently. One of the bathers fell into deep wa'er, and twenty minutes elapsed before the body could be recovered. On being before the body could be recovered. On being the body could be recovered. life was not extinct, and, strange to say, the subject of the accident has altogether recover ed. The facts of this strange case are attested by many persons who were in the bath at the time when the affair happened.
